Don't Undercook Pork, Health Officer Advises

Roy O. Gilbert, M.D.,
Los Angeles County
Health Officer

Trichinosis is primarily a disease of hogs that are fed on garbage containing remnants of trichinous pork. The infection may also be carried by rats, cats, dogs, bears, and other animals.

Unfortunately, it may be transmitted to man, and, in the majority of instances, the only way a person gets the disease is by eating pork that is insufficiently cooked.

The cause of the disorder, the trichina, is a worm that lives in the muscles of infected hogs. When the undercooked meat of these animals is eaten, the parasite is ingested in its encysted form which develops into worms that reproduce in the intestinal tract.

The infant worms or larvae pass through the intestinal wall into the blood stream and lodge in the muscles of the human body where they eventually build up a wall or cyst around themselves. The severity of the disease depends upon the number of living larvae that are eaten.

Some years ago it was estimated that about 16,000,000 persons in the United States were infected. Fortunately, the infection is generally not of a serious nature.

Symptoms that may occur in severe infections include: nausea and vomiting, diarrhea or constipation, and abdominal cramps which result from the irritation of the intestinal tract by the adult worm. Fever and swelling of the eyelids are also common and early symptoms. Inflammation in the muscle fibers is noticed in the form of swelling or pain, particularly when the individual uses the muscles involved.

Half of the passenger cars in the U.S. are four-door sedans, reports the Automobile Club of Southern California.

of 1,149,098 commercially raised hogs in the country are now fed raw garbage.

However, there is no control over the individual farmer who may feed his hogs garbage in which there are scraps of pork containing trichina cysts. Even in grain fed hogs there is a possible danger of infection since these animals will eat any garbage that are found, which might be a source of the infection.
